The biomedical science course covers a broad subject area, as topics include microbiology, genetics, cancer and cell biology, with opportunities to specialise in areas of interest. These areas can be quite complex if you want to specialise in them, but they are very interesting and students often prefer that to very general teaching about many different topics.

Excerpt from A Manual of Bacteriology for Agricultural and General Science Students In addition to the outline for the study of bacteria, a section has been added outlining the study of important fermentations caused principally by fungi. In most cases the agricultural student desires to become acquainted with the more fundamental principles of the cultivation of these organisms.
